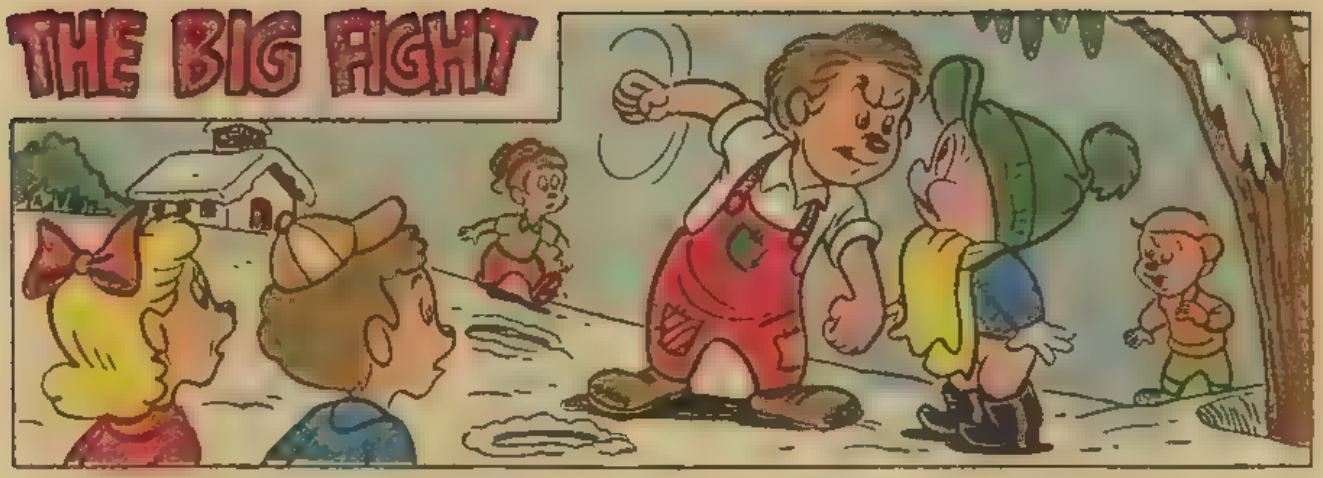
THE BIG FIGHT



"The kids will laugh at me," Cicero complained, eyeing the muffler and boots Petunia had bought him to wear to school. "I'll look like a sissy!"

"Well," Petunia said briskly, "at least you won't catch cold."

Only Cicero's eyes were visible between the muffler and the peaked stocking cap, as he trudged on his way to school.

"Well, if it isn't Buster Brown," a voice growled sarcastically.

Cicero's heart sank. It was the new boy at school, and he was very big and very tough. And, what's more, he did not wear a hat, or a muffler, OR boots.

The big boy swaggered toward Cicero. "What are you dressed up for?" he hooted. "Look at him, everyone!"

The two were quickly surrounded by a group of children on their way to school, who had stopped to watch the fun.

"Go ahead, Cicero. Sock him," one boy shouted.

The bully moved his shoulder under Cicero's chin. "Why don't you?" he invited. "Afraid?"

The taunt hurt. As Cicero swung, he saw Petunia's face before him, then a blaze of bright stars, as he went to the ground.

A few moments later, Cicero found himself alone and late for class.

When the teacher saw Cicero's black eye, she said sternly, "Fighting certainly doesn't take any brains. It's for people with big muscles and little minds. I'll have to make you stay after school and write on the blackboard FIGHTING IS FOOLISH one hundred times."

It was very late when Cicero completed his task. He lingered on his way home from school, not the least bit anxious to face up to Petunia. Then, suddenly, he saw the glow of a fire a short distance away. Slipping behind the trees, Cicero crept up closer to the fire and stopped dead in his tracks. For, hunched in front of the blaze, blowing on his hands, was the big boy who had tormented him. Cicero suddenly understood. He watched the big boy pull a hard crust of bread out of an old red handkerchief and chew on it hungrily. When Cicero accidentally made a sound, the boy was on his feet, looking around wildly.

"Who's there?" he shouted.

Much to his own surprise, Cicero was not the least bit afraid. "It's just me," he said gently.

The big boy was somewhat taken aback "What do you want?" he growled.

"Nothing," Cicero said. "I was just wondering if maybe you'd do me a favor. You see, I hate beef stew, and Petunia was making a big pot of it when I left this morning. I wondered if . . well, maybe you'd come over and eat some so I won't have to eat it all week."

The big boy eyed him carefully, then said, "Sure," and, quietly and quickly, put out the fire.

Sometime during supper, Petunia seemed to catch on to at least a part of what had happened. "Why don't you spend the night here if no one will worry," she suggested kindly.

The next day, she laid out Cicero's boots and muffler. "Not again," Cicero pleaded.

"Put 'em on, bub!" the big boy directed

Cicero took one look at him and did a double take. For, around his neck was a bright green muffler, and on his feet were the biggest boots he had ever seen!
